I just stumbled upon the Chinese.SE website. In contrast to the English.SE site, the interface, the navigation structure, the styling etc. don't seem to fit the Chinese language. Looking at the Japanese.SE website, it seems to me the site design fits much better. Does this mean that questions about Chinese language should be asked on a site dedicated to Chinese users? Does it make sense to migrate questions to the site dedicated for Chinese users only or is it rather considered bad to do so? On the one hand, it's very likely that a lot of low quality questions would be left in the question because they don't have an account on a specific site. On the other hand, sites are serving as a resource for the relevant users, not for people that visit Stack Exchange sites frequently. PS: If the question is too opinion based, feel free to close it. A: It's not appropriate for first-time users, but of course nothing is. The best thing to do is to try to offer some help and guidance and work with a user to help them get in the right mindset for asking questions. You can get a limited number of people to help you out for free, the more you help out the more it counts towards a free question badge, or you can pay to get more people helping you out. In general I wouldn't push to move first-time questions to a site that doesn't answer them, but if you do make sure that it can be answered. A: The very first users of a beta site will almost always have far less experience than would be found on the
